A battue differs dramatically from a standard target in one significant way: It lacks mass at the edges. As a result, it tends to turn over (or not) at a certain point in the target's flight, depending on the wind and the way in which the target setter sets the trap. The target setter usually presents the battue's belly or face just prior ...

The battue was originally designed to be thrown driven. When thrown this way, it peels away from the shooter as would a true driven pheasant. Today, due to safety concerns, we seldom see the battue thrown for its original intended purpose. Nonetheless, the battue still remains a unique and fascinating target.
